

2. Improving the quality of students entering the institutions, by improving alliances with highly qualified high school graduates through feeder schools program, and teacher development programs with schools districts in key markets.
3. Expanding relationships with middle and school counselors and principals aimed at developing college preparation and mentoring programs with the students and their college mentors.
4. Improving the management and use of the data for continuous improvement, decision making, and resource allocation. The data is already available, because HBCUs already collect enormous amounts of data on student outcomes, institutional practices and other efficiency measures which are reported to the states, the Department of Education and accreditation agencies.
5. Expanding their role as advocates of K-12 reforms and taking the lead in lobbying for more state and federal assistance to develop programs at feeder schools.
6. Making a greater effort of attracting students from all ethnic groups in both urban and rural middle and high schools. HBCUs must improve their alliances with the Hispanic community, Asian and Tribal communities, local community colleges, and other four-year colleges.
7. Expanding the relationships with students as well as parents and continue fostering the relationship with parents from the freshman through to the senior year.
8. Improving public perception of the institutions by strengthening their public relations strategy. This strategy should focus on promoting the institution's signature programs and the uniqueness of the respective campuses.
9. Strengthening the tracking of first year and sophomore students who are enrolled and those who drop out or stop out.

Change may be difficult at several institutions based on campus morale, entrenched culture, and the management style of administrators at the respective institutions. However, long-term survival is dependent on reforming the campuses to meet the performance metrics outlined by President Obama's "reach to the top" college graduation goals.
